Boko Haram forces have seized control of the town of Damasak, in Borno state, one of the six states that make up Nigeria's northeast. The town had been abandoned by the Nigerian army in 2014, after months of aerial bombardment and fighting with the group. The military said in a statement that Damasak had been taken by force. "The Nigerian Army has had an exchange of fire with Boko Haram terrorists in Damasak, Bayelsa state, but so far without casualties. We will continue to sustain the offensive to dislodge the terrorists from Damasak and restore peace to the area," the statement said. An army spokesman said that the Nigerian troops were fighting Boko Haram extremists on a large scale to "disrupt their activities, disrupt their game plan, disrupt their socialisation plan, disrupt their linkage plan and win the day". Human rights groups said that the Islamist insurgents had seized large parts of the town, including the local government headquarters. Human Rights Watch said there was no sign of a Nigerian army counter-offensive, and there were no reports of civilian casualties. The US state department condemned the takeover as a "step in the wrong direction" that "further emboldens" Boko Haram. "This step in the wrong direction further emboldens Boko

Haram, whose atrocities have claimed thousands of innocent lives. The United States stands with the Nigerian people and government to support the nation's efforts to restore peace and security in all regions of the country," a spokesman said. The Islamist group has carried out frequent attacks in Nigeria, often in the north-east, in the past two years. In 2014, the Nigerian army abandoned the town of Baga in the face of a relentless attack that killed and raped thousands of civilians. Aid workers said that after the army left Damasak, the Boko Haram group seized the town. "The Nigerian military abandoned us. They left us in a ditch and we were left to die," the group's former spokesman, Abul 82157476af
