Not having a volume slider's not good but I can live with that.

The game forgetting the resolution you set the game to I can live with as well - it remembers all other settings regarding anisotropic filtering and such.

The issue(s) I have with it is that:

You get no form of an overview of the (lane...is it a golf lane...?) thing, field, whatever it's called, which makes the guesstimation of what to do quite impossible as you don't know what to do\where to go...

The aiming feels a bit like it suffers from mouse acceleration\momentum which may make the character move a tad when you release the button, would prob. have a lot less impact if you lower the sensitivity on your mouse. (if you have one with dedicated drivers\software)

The character aims anywhere before each hit, having it aim straight down the middle of the (thing) would make it faster as it can basically aim straight into the side as it is now...

Maybe it's something for the person reading this, it's not a game for me though, unfortunately...
